Tiffany McKinzie

Style Maker

Tiffany McKinzie became a designer out of necessity. As she and her husband built several homes for their family through the years, she became frustrated with the breakdown in communication between the builder, contractors, and vendors. "I would just take charge of the whole thing, sketching out the floorplan and coordinating with all of the vendors," she says. "Eventually, I used my experience and skill set to start my own interior design business. Before I knew it, one job turned into 10 and growing."

Since 2002 McKinzie has executed the exquisite designs of hundreds of new construction and renovation projects. When McKinzie first began interior design work, she leaned toward more traditional looks but lately has been enjoying her contemporary projects. "I have a respect for the uniqueness of all styles," she says. Clients love McKinzie's transparency and reliability and appreciate how she comfortably brings forward their desires and translates them into their new surroundings. "I love that my clients are open to all of the possibilities of a home's design," she says. "It sounds contradictory, but hiring a designer can actually save money. It can also save time and frustration. Using a designer pays you back in several ways, first and foremost loving the home you're in."
